ABSTRACT

One of the government's interests in the development of coastal areas is the program for the welfare of fishermen. Ship assistance is one of the ways that these efforts are made. It might be challenging to pinpoint the program's influence and success elements along the road, though. This study aimed to evaluate the effects of fishing boat aid from institutional, sociocultural, and economic perspectives. To provide a clear image of the sustainability of the fishing boat support program, this study focuses on examining the effect and success elements of ship help. The approach makes use of the RAPFISH (Rapid Appraisal for Fisheries) method qualities in conjunction with the Multidimensional Scaling (MDS) technique. According to the study's findings, the institutional aspect's RSQ was 54.87%, the cultural aspect was 36.37%, and the economic aspect was 47.93%. The level of institutional sustainability is the highest. Additionally, the primary element bolstering and pushing the effectiveness of fishing boat aid is the direction indicator. To establish government policies and directions for boosting fishing production generally and especially in the Tomini Bay Area, this research helps describe the economic, social, and institutional implications of fishing boat support.
